

New Film Profiles Famed SC Activist and Educator Dr. Benjamin E. Mays

Written by Staff Writer

Thursday, 30 August 2012 07:59 - Last Updated Thursday, 30 August 2012 08:20

In a new film biography of South Carolinian Dr. Benjamin Mays, Andrew Young says it this way: "If there hadn't been a Benjamin Mays, there wouldn't have been a Martin Luther King, Jr." The legacy of this South Carolina native is explored in the new film Born to Rebel, Driven to Excel from South Carolina ETV, premiering in special screenings and on television in September.

Benjamin Mays, from Epworth, South Carolina, saw the racism and forced segregation of life around him and decided to challenge it with education and religion. Against the advice of his father, Mays pursued a formal education and rose to the top of his class, becoming Dean of Religion at Howard University, and later earned a Doctor of Philosophy from the University of Chicago. He would become President of Morehouse College in 1940, and his influence on civil rights and education for the next three decades would reach far and wide. He met with Mahatma Gandhi, led Atlanta's desegregation effort, and convinced Gone with the Wind author Margaret Mitchell to (secretly) sponsor students. He was mentor and spiritual father to Martin Luther King, Jr., who credited him as his inspiration for joining the ministry. King selected Mays to give his eulogy in the event of his death, a task Mays would fulfill. Interviewees include Andrew Young, Hank Aaron, Mays' great niece Dr. Marshalyn Yeargin-Allsopp, and Dr. Robert Franklin, current president of Morehouse College.

New Film Profiles Famed SC Activist and Educator Dr. Benjamin E. Mays

Written by Staff Writer

Thursday, 30 August 2012 07:59 - Last Updated Thursday, 30 August 2012 08:20

Born to Rebel, Driven to Excel debuts at a special screening at the Arts Center of Greenwood (120 Main Street) on September 8 at 3 p.m., followed by a panel discussion including Mays' secretary Sally Warner and his great niece. The film also screens in Columbia September 10 at the new Nickelodeon Theatre (1607 Main St.). Admission is free for both screenings. The statewide broadcast premiere is September 13 at 8 p.m. on South Carolina ETV.

Born to Rebel, Driven to Excel is part of a continuing South Carolina ETV series on inductees to the South Carolina Hall of Fame. The producer/director is Tabitha Safdi, and the Executive Producers are Steve Folks and Amy Shumaker.